

bonanza corporations, seeking to exploit it for the profit of stockholders who live somewhere else. But on the other hand, it is worth while to emphasize that many of the most valued resources of the West are of such character, and their development must be on such a scale, that they can only be made available under concentrated management and by the use of capital in large units. We must enforce measures which will give capital and management attractive returns, but which will always keep in sight the primary purpose of dealing out justice, even-handed opportunity, and an absolutely fair interest in the product of human
